Sonographic recognition of arterial pulmonary lesions in patients with cancer. Pulmonary metastases of internal malignancies are common and are often detected during routine staging studies. The vasculature of the lungs is the most common site of metastases and emboli, often comprising the only abnormal blood vessels in patients. Although such lesions may be easily recognized by radiography, they are often not seen radiographically and are therefore often overlooked during staging studies. In an attempt to detect such lesions by transcutaneous ultrasound, the appearance and echogenicity of pulmonary arterial lesions seen in 1,923 consecutive patients who underwent staging studies for carcinoma of the colon or lung were retrospectively reviewed. One or more arterial lesions were seen in 44 patients (2.4% of the study population). In 30 patients, the lesions were in the distal pulmonary arteries, whereas in 14 patients, the lesions were seen in the proximal pulmonary arteries. With the exception of one case with acute embolism seen after a large-bowel resection, all of the lesions were recognized as masses that appeared normal, or nearly normal, on radiographic studies. The detection rate for pulmonary arterial lesions was highest in patients with lung or large-bowel carcinoma.
