The increasing use of technology by college and university students to gather information has greatly increased the need for the examination of ethical issues related to the use of the internet. This course focuses on the ethics of academic conduct in information resource use as well as issues in internet usage by college students. This includes: Identifying the student's role in obtaining and using information resources; identifying the unique circumstances of the student that affect that role; understanding that students may not always know what is ethical and unethical in their use of information resources; and recognising that the environment of a student's institution and the society in which it is situated may influence how the student uses information resources. This course meets the NEET and NEHLS requirements for a core, mandatory course. Who Should Attend: In this course you will learn how to:

- Identify the different types of ethical issues related to the use of information resources and the internet, and where they may come up for the college and university student.
- Understand the ethical issues that arise from having a role in obtaining and using information resources.
- Identify the unique circumstances of the student that affect that role.
- Recognise that students may not always know what is ethical and unethical in their use of information resources.
- Identify where the environment of a student's institution and the society in which it is situated may influence how the student uses information resources.

This course will be valuable to:

- Students who are new to using information resources, and to identifying and addressing ethical issues related to the use of information resources and the internet.
- Students who are new to ethical issues, and to the environment and society in which they live, and to use of information resources.
- Students who are involved in research and literature review.
- Students whose institutions have developed policies regarding the use of information resources.
- Students who supervise students who use information resources.
- Students who teach classes in ethics.

Teaching Methods: This course involves a combination of lectures, readings, demonstrations, group work, and discussion. Grading: This course will have a final examination. The course will normally consist of a multiple choice question paper, and a written work, and a two-hour presentation to the class, which will be graded as part of the course. The course will be held in the first term of each semester. The marks for the course will be added to the student's overall marks, and will be recorded in the student's personal file. Entry 1d6a3396d6
