release from triethylamine and dimethylaminopyridine modified chitosan hydrogels for enhanced delivery of antibacterial agents.
Chitosan hydrogels based on the crosslink between triethylamine

(TEA) or dimethylaminopyridine (DMAP) modified chitosan (CTS) and sodium tripolyphosphate (TPP) were prepared and loaded with gentamicin sulfate (GM) for sustained release of GM. Different types of GM-loaded hydrogels were characterized by the different degrees of swelling, crosslink densities and drug release profiles. In vitro drug release was carried out in PBS solution, and the drug release profiles fitted well with the Korsmeyer-Peppas model. In comparison with a traditional system of GM-loaded CTS/TPP hydrogels, TEA- and DMAP-modified CTS/TPP hydrogels enhanced the drug release rate and sustained effect of GM. The biocompatibility test demonstrated that the drug-loaded hydrogels could be used safely in the same way as a normal burn dressing. The DMAP-CTS/TPP hydrogels were therefore developed to be potential cutaneous antibacterial drug delivery system. A review of 13 case series describing the head and neck manifestations of brucellosis in humans. To review the head and neck manifestations of brucellosis and provide recommendations for diagnosis and treatment of this rare disease. MEDLINE searches were performed from January 1966 to January 2002. Articles were included if they were written in English, reported clinical findings from patients with a diagnosis of brucellosis, and provided sufficient data to assess the study's objective. Bibliographies of selected articles were reviewed and cross-referenced for additional relevant citations. A total of 13 case series, including 23 patients, met the inclusion criteria. A wide spectrum of head and neck manifestations occurred in these patients. Half of the patients had localized lesions that were primarily painless. For 2 of 23 patients, brucellar spondylitis was the first presentation of brucellosis. The majority of the patients were treated with a standard regimen of combination
