Getting started with Photoshop With the all-new, state-of-the-art user interface, tools, features, and shortcuts, editing images with Photoshop is a breeze. It's a different experience from older versions, and a step-up when you start editing your own images. Using the interface, you can change any tool to its default setting—which may or may not be the best choice for your image—and more importantly, you can easily find those tools in the menus using a new, way-finding "toolbox" that appears once you start an editing project. You can also control the quality of your image with the new, much improved Color Picker in this version. Editing image files With Photoshop, you can do all your image editing in the "raw" format. The editing process is in linear steps, meaning Photoshop is searching for a fix for every change to the image, like a painter would, instead of making a ton of changes to the pixels of the image. The raw image format is read-only, and therefore, it's best for the creation of large images. You can view the raw file data in a preview window and make your changes there. If you're editing a layered file, you'll first need to flatten the image. There are several different methods for this; a popular method is to convert the image to a CMYK or RGB color space. It takes only a moment of pressing a key on a keyboard and tapping on the screen of a smartphone for death or other major incidents to happen. The rate of such incidents spiked following the November 2015 terror attack at the Bataclan concert hall in Paris, after which several people suffered minor injuries when shooter Omar Ismail Mostefai became the first perpetrator to open fire. Such incidents are now an everyday occurrence in every European country, and the fear of such events has changed everyday lives and lifestyles. Since 2014, the number of deaths due to terrorism in Germany has almost doubled, according to statistics from the Interior Ministry. The number of incidents has also spiked significantly, jumping from 4,832 in 2013 to 9,987 in 2016. But Germany is not alone. In the EU as a whole, more than 350 people have been killed by terrorist attacks in recent years. At least 500 people have been killed in France alone during the same period, putting the country in the top three terror hotspots in the EU after France, Belgium and the UK. Following the Bataclan attack in France, German officials started publishing daily death tolls online. The last one in Germany was on November 12. In 2015, the number of attacks actually increased from 12 to 25 compared to 2014. Germany: A divided nation In a two-page article published in the newspaper Süddeutsche Zeitung last week, Frank Schirrmeyer and Michael Siefert argue that the ideology of the so-called "Islamic State" (IS) has directly inspired terrorists in Germany. The reality, however, is more nuanced, and experts say that while IS is clearly able to recruit a certain segment of the population into its ranks, the group does not play a key role in the terror incidents in Germany. Michael Menzel from the Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung think tank wrote in the daily Frankfurter Allgemeine that "the IS ideology has nothing to do with the majority of German-based terror attacks." The most common perpetrators, he said, are "lone wolves", who are men in their late 30s or 40s in Germany, including the three persons behind the Berlin bombing last year. Germany has, however, experienced several "home-grown" terror attacks in recent years. The so-called "Yellow vests" protest movement has been closely associated with right-wing terrorism. Stats I'd like to see if i can finish the last page of this. It took me 2 days to make this commission. I had to rush it and here it is. I originally had more background but i couldnt work out how to style it properly so i just scrapped the whole thing. Thanks so much, Asooth. I was very tickled by this. My expressionless-type-faces are starting to come together as a group. I was excited to read this! And a really cool series. I can't wait to see the final picture. That's going to be a stunner! And the last picture is rendered, I'm working on chapter 1 of my own manga now. So I finally have something new to work on after almost a year of nothing. But I'm going to focus on art after school instead of programming, that will be my 'hobby' after I get a job. Oh well, maybe it will be fun at least. I really did really bad at art back when I was in high school. Heck, as far back as primary school, even.
