The fact that anyone can freely browse the Internet should not be a cause for alarm. All things considered, one must accept that there are some potentially dangerous individuals out there that are just out to get you or your bank account. Fortunately, there are many ways to prevent you from becoming a victim to identity theft, one of which is through the use of a good antivirus software. Antivirus software acts as a watchdog when you surf the web, blocking out malicious code from invading your system. It can also be used to monitor internet traffic, looking for non-related users like torrent clients, exploit kits or malware and cleaning each one that has been detected. Aside from watching out for what you're doing, the next step is to configure it in the most appropriate way for your computer. Q: How to monitor a C/C++ executable using Linux? I need a utility that will monitor a C/C++ executable and in the case of an error, it will alert me. I need to know if the executable is still running, what's the output, whether it's an output of a library, some log, etc. I was thinking about strace but I didn't like the way it tells me what it's doing like "fread()". I'm also interested in being able to specify a period of time for a watch to monitor. The utility should be able to monitor and control (run) the executable using gdb, but at least for starters I would prefer to just use ordinary linux tools.

A: strace is not exactly what you're after, strace has a few bugs in its strace_*_process interface, for example on my system, the standard output is reported when a process exits, instead of when it terminates.
