In most cases, the student-teacher exchanges are a mutually beneficial mix. But for a group of teachers in New Delhi's government schools, it's an unpleasant reality. Teachers in government-run schools often complain about being stigmatized and blamed for poor academic results, and are rarely offered help. "They've made a lot of noise in the media. But I'm telling you, we don't have this issue at all," he says. The New York-based organization Educators 4 Excellence (E4E) decided to be brutally honest in a study of India's teacher shortage. Many teachers in India are not trained, the numbers are manipulated by senior managers, and the academic results aren't improving at all. But even the sub-standard teachers are vocal and determined to be not held responsible for the results, says Manoj Singh. Singh says he is one of the few teachers in Delhi to speak up about the problem, risking his job. "The pressure to teach to a certain standard is getting ever worse." In this Saturday,

It's April 27, the day when the Supreme Court is due to hear the Keshav Singh Paharor case. For much of his life, he has been awake for 24 hours every day, propped up by his wife. He spends whole days and nights watching cricket, a sport he loves, and eating vada pao, a street food India is known for. A custom that's given him more than a few stomach problems. Gursimran Singh is one of the many men who will be kept awake for four days by pranal upadhyaya. For Gursimran, this is his fate: he was about to commit one of the worst crimes imaginable - murdering his brother. His brother Ram Singh was a small time player, and he had been in the wrong place at the wrong time. Gursimran Singh was a local who found himself competing for the biggest prize around - his brother's bootlegging business. He knew the risks and took his decision. He was a techie but was worried about the political fallout. He found a solution to his problem that looked simple enough: send a telegram to his brother. sign the name of his brother's secretary and get his brother's absconding gang to turn him in to the police. Pranal Upadhyaya hopes he's caught before he does the dirty deed. For more on today's show, visit our website at KFOR.com.
